Science Museum for the Future

It's the year 2122. A visitor at the Science Museum is looking at a display on geriatric medicine over the past 150 years. What objects might they see? Whose voices might they hear? What words might they read?

Imagine you are creating a museum display, what would you put on display to represent your experiences of working in geriatric medicine, including during the COVID-19 pandemic?

Come and visit the Science Museum booth run by Selina Hurley, Curator of Medicine, with printed out photos of your objects, or come and add words to the mood-board.

Towards the end of the conference sessions on Wednesday 16 November, we will imagine a display, thinking about what it might look like, what common themes there are, and what we'd want people to know. It will be a glimpse into how displays and exhibitions are made.

There will a chance to virtually explore some of the museum's collection in an object quiz. The Science Museum has world's largest medical galleries featuring more than 3,000 medical artefacts, striking artworks, interactive games and immersive experiences that bring the history of medicine to life. The Science Museum also cares for around 100,000 from Sir Henry Wellcome's museum collection and is constantly adding to their collection.

Come along, be creative, and what you suggest might one day find a home at the Science Museum.

Please join us in Room 2 on Wednesday for this interactive session with any ideas you have.
